

LJMU Research Online

Clampin, DJ

A farewell to ahistoricism

<http://researchonline.ljmu.ac.uk/id/eprint/4155/>

Article

Citation (please note it is advisable to refer to the publisher's version if you intend to cite from this work)

Clampin, DJ (2016) A farewell to ahistoricism. Journal of Historical Research in Marketing, 8 (4). pp. 595-598. ISSN 1755-750X

LJMU has developed LJMU Research Online for users to access the research output of the University more effectively. Copyright © and Moral Rights for the papers on this site are retained by the individual authors and/or other copyright owners. Users may download and/or print one copy of any article(s) in LJMU Research Online to facilitate their private study or for non-commercial research. You may not engage in further distribution of the material or use it for any profit-making activities or any commercial gain.

The version presented here may differ from the published version or from the version of the record. Please see the repository URL above for details on accessing the published version and note that access may require a subscription.

For more information please contact researchonline@ljmu.ac.uk

<http://researchonline.ljmu.ac.uk/>

A farewell to ahistoricism.

| | |
|------------------|---|
| Journal: | Journal of Historical Research in Marketing |
| Manuscript ID | JHRM-09-2016-0022 |
| Manuscript Type: | Explorations and Insights |
| Keywords: | Historical research methods, cultural history, agents of change |
| | |

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

A farewell to ahistoricism. Reviewing D. G. Brian Jones and Mark Tadajewski (eds.),
The Routledge Companion to Marketing History, Routledge, Abingdon, 2016.

The Routledge Companions in Business, Management and Accounting set themselves up as reputable reference works providing 'an overview of a whole subject area or sub-discipline'. Indeed, they are offered as a work of reference, a "go to" volume which might provide the best insight or initiation into a subject, field or perspective, a 'one-stop-shop resource for each theme covered'. This edition, relating to marketing history, without doubt achieves that. Its range is vast and the detailed and comprehensive nature of the coverage is impressive. It is international in its scope, offering nine country-specific histories as well as a full array of specific marketing practices from market research, packaging and retail, through to distribution, competition and anti-trust law, and selling and sales management. It is easy to imagine how this volume will quickly establish itself as the first port of call for anyone wanting to understand the basic features and factors of these areas of history. Thus, Schwarzkopf provides a thorough introduction to the history of market research, identifying the key moments and players that is likely to stimulate, guide and inform further research. Fullerton draws on a great reservoir of knowledge to present a condensed range of observations and findings pertaining to segmentation in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Meanwhile, it is difficult to imagine a better entry into the specifics and facets of US antitrust law and EU competition law than the respective chapters of Petty and Pressey. However, to my mind, the greater value of this volume lies above and beyond what is so usefully provided in this manner. These Routledge Companions endeavour to offer a 'survey of the state of the discipline' and the judicious selection of chapters by Jones and Tadajewski really brings this to the fore.

The gauntlet is thrown down in Jones and Tadajewski's introduction where they reflect on, and challenge, Fullerton's lament that marketing is ahistorical (p. 1). The chapters provided here offer ample evidence that the discipline is well beyond that and now embraces the very best of historicism. At the time of writing hordes of undergraduates are on the cusp of beginning history programmes in the UK. Many will do so with Tosh's perennial The Pursuit of History by their side via which they might understand the foundations and philosophy of the discipline. In there, Tosh observes,

"Historians are not the guardians of universal values, nor can they deliver 'the verdict of history'; they must strive to understand each age on its own values and priorities instead of imposing ours" (2015, p. 6).

The historicist cherishes the socio-cultural context of the moment, and many of the chapters in this book do this so well in painting vivid pictures of the interconnections between the

1
2
3 society and times upon which they report, the activities and practices which grow out of that
4 and, in their turn, shape those moments. The historicist appreciates historical periods on 5 their own terms and develops an understanding of the topic, be that packaging, selling or
6 advertising, relative to the times within which they occurred. For Munslow,
7
8

9
10 “events, actions and thoughts should be appreciated set within their specific historical 11 moment...By this argument historians empathise with the social conditions that gave 12 rise to actions that occurred at a particular place in time” (2000, p. 130).
13

14
15 Marketers today surely appreciate the fallacy of ‘universal values, and not only learn from 16 the past but equally appreciate how methods and practices developed over time, were 17 informed by the age in which they occurred, and how contemporary context is key.
18
19

20
21 The chapters in this volume do the editors proud in dispelling the spectre of 22 ahistoricism. Marketing is firmly embedded in and integrated with the past, not set up as an 23 adjunct to it. Further, those practices are shown, in their turn, to influence and shape the 24 past. In this fashion marketing scholars will certainly find this volume enlightening and 25 informative. However, I also hope that historians more broadly will read parts of it and come
26 to appreciate how past cultures and societies can be understood through the marketing
27 practices of the time. For example, Sreekumar and Varman’s chapter on marketing in India
28 demonstrates how trade was driven in the ancient period by the ‘diversity of soil and climate’
29 necessitating trade to obtain goods from the outside which could not be produced at home,
30 tipping a nod to the Annales School (p. 390). The point is further reinforced by Alexander,
31 with reference to Riello (2006), where he notes the shift in the new millennium away from 32 merely studying processes and practices in retail to appreciate the wider milieu in which 33 these are played out:
34
35
36
37
38
39

40
41 “The history of retailing is no longer the historical analysis of practices, shops, or 42 products. It appears, instead, as the historical investigation of the rationality and 43 strategic actions that influenced consumers, producers, and retailers” (Riello 2006
44 quoted in Alexander, p. 157).
45
46

47
48 The chapters in this volume clearly establish how acquisition and the exchange of goods is
49 fundamental to humankind and has been throughout history. The topics covered are scenes
50 of power, influence and change. Tamilia plots how the rise of a merchant class from the 51 eleventh to the eighteenth century ‘disrupted the feudal political system and diminished the 52 power of the reigning monarchs and nobles who controlled the lives of people under the 53 heavy influence of church doctrine’ (p. 178). Shaw’s chapter on ancient and medieval 54 marketing, grounding the organisation of society relative to trading practices (pp. 24 – 6) is 55 articulately set up while Witkowski’s following chapter outlines how the history of 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 consumption and the history of consumers both reflects the context of the time but also acts
4 as an agent of change in itself (p. 44).
5

6
7 These robust swipes at ahistoricism acknowledge those disruptive elements in
8 history which have the power to banish theoretical projections or models. In similar fashion
9 Petty clearly establishes how branding is not necessarily there to be studied merely because 10 it occurs, nor in order to appreciate the intricacies and practices associated with it, but takes 11 an all-encompassing view which sees the need for branding as a consequence of 12 circumstance and context, the confluence of events and developments which in combination
13 create change. Thus, in the US, the development of distribution by railroad and national 14 advertising in newspapers and magazines (p. 110), developments which Twede also points
15 to in the history of packaging (p. 117).
16
17
18
19

20
21 The Routledge Companion to Marketing History offers an excellent introduction to 22 many aspects of the history of marketing but, more than that, this is a volume that triumphs
23 the place of marketing as a conduit to social and cultural history: many of these chapters
24 whilst ostensibly histories of their respective disciplines and practices, are also great 25 histories and reflections of the times upon which they report. Returning to Jones and 26 Tadajewski's introduction they observe,
27
28
29

30
31 "exploring the development of marketing from a wider perspective indicates the 32 extent to which marketing is affected by political, economic, technological, ethical and 33 cultural change" (p. 10).
34
35

36 This is well captured in the chapters put together here and reflects not just the state of 37 marketing history but key developments in social and cultural history in general which 38 triumph the agency of consumption through history [see the work of Daunton and Hilton
39 (2001), Hilton (2003), Mort (1996), and Trentmann (2006; 2008; 2016)]. Perhaps the editors 40 sell themselves short because these chapters do not just record how marketing has been 41 affected by the times and environment within which it was conceived but also amply 42 demonstrates how marketing has played a part in affecting and shaping the past. Thus,
43 Boothman demonstrates how, with specific regard to retailing in North America, public space
44 was fundamentally reconfigured (p. 144). Speaking for Britain, Alexander, in similar fashion,
45 offers the department store as 'a means to explore cultural and social, as well as economic,
46 change' (p. 158). Meanwhile Powers highlights the disruptive force of the travelling salesmen
47 entering new spaces and places, bringing with them new ideas and insights (p. 227).
48
49 Ultimately, Shapiro captures this spirit by drawing on the work of Brewer and Porter:
50
51
52
53
54
55

56
57 "our understanding of the development of western societies will remain dramatically
58 impoverished unless we confront the fact that such polities, uniquely in world history,
59
60

1
2
3 have come to revolve around the mass consumption of goods and services...it is 4 imperative that we investigate in the most comprehensive way the links connecting 5 this material culture...to the political and social systems with which it became 6 symbiotic” (p. 250).
7
8

9
10 This volume provides an excellent insight into ‘the state of the discipline’ and serves to 11 enrich our understanding of western societies in often surprising and unexpected ways.
12 Whilst I have no doubt that this volume will be found indispensable in many business
13 schools, I also hope it establishes a well-deserved presence in history departments as well.
14 Should anybody be labouring under the notion that marketing is ahistorical, they should read
15 this volume to appreciate the nature of historicism in the round.
16
17
18

19 References

20
21 Conekin, B., Mort, F. and Waters, C. (eds.) (1999), Moments of Modernity: Reconstructing
22 Britain 1945–1964, Rivers Oram Press, London.
23

24
25 Daunton, M. and Hilton, M. (eds.) (2001), The Politics of Consumption: Material Culture and
26 Citizenship in Europe and America, Berg, Oxford.
27

28
29 Hilton, M. (2003), Consumerism in Twentieth-Century Britain: The Search for a Historical 30 Movement, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
31

32
33 Mort, F. (1996), Cultures of Consumption: Commerce, Masculinities and Social Space,
34 Routledge, Abingdon.
35

36
37 Munslow, A. (2000), The Routledge Companion to Historical Studies, Routledge, London.
38

39
40 Tosh, J. (2015), The Pursuit of History. Aims, Methods and New Directions in the Study of 41 History, Sixth Edition, Routledge, London.
42

43
44 Trentmann, F. (2008), Free Trade Nation, Oxford University Press, Oxford.
45

46
47 Trentmann, F. (ed.) (2006), The Making of the Consumer: Knowledge, Power and Identity in 48 the Modern World, Berg, Oxford.
49

50
51 Trentmann, F. (2016), Empire of Things: How We Became A World of Consumers, from the 52 Fifteenth Century to the Twenty-First, Allen Lane, London.
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60